

ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

permanent magnets in which the ferromagnetic phase is matched with the grain boundary phase, and permanent magnets in which magnetocrystalline anisotropy in the vicinity of the outermost shell of the major phase is equivalent in intensity to that in the inside to suppress nucleation of the inverse magnetic domain. Guideline for designing permanent magnets having high magnetic performance is provided.